All electric homes are cheaper to build and operate!

In January, gas prices in Nevada hit a 12-year high, and prices are forecasted to remain high throughout 2022 and even into 2023. For households seeking relief from painfully high gas bills, the study finds that it is economically feasible and can deliver energy cost savings to upgrade to a heat pump when the central air conditioning system needs to be replaced.

This year, however, utility companies such as Southwest Gas and Nevada Energy are attempting to double and triple down on plans to build out expensive fossil gas infrastructure, delivery systems, and residential tie-ins and hookups that will lock in more climate-heating emissions, more indoor and outdoor air pollution, as well as force new homeowners to pay for retrofits to convert to all-electric. Their plans will deepen the reliance states like Nevada have on imports of out-of-state fossil gas, rather than homegrown renewable energy solutions such as solar power.

Natalia Powell's Story!

On the topic of burning fossil fuels. FOA had the privilege of working with Natalia Powell on sharing her story of how air pollution impacted her family's health. It is important to keep your families health in mind when deciding between gas and electric. Electric is always proven to be the safer option!
